Love.

Why can't we all love one another?

Am I not acceptable in society because of the color of my skin?

Is it because I'm just a little darker then you why I'm treated and looked down upon?

Last time I checked we all bleed red blood.

So are we really that different?

Racism is something that is taught.

When a child is born, that child is born innocent.

They teach their children that because my skin is darker they are superior.

They teach them that we are not equals in anyways.

Because of that I am discriminated against.

Discriminated against because my nose is a little broader.

Discriminated against because my lips are a little bigger.

Discriminated against because my hairs little kinkier.

But those are the qualities that make me beautiful.

But instead of seeing the things that make me beautiful,

You look at them as reasons as to why you feel you can walk over me.

You think that because of those reasons I don't deserve to live.

I can never have the same things as you.

When you see me doing good and building for myself, you feel as if the right thing to do is somehow break me down.

Why break each other down when we're really supposed to be building each other up.

Mutual interdependence.

We all need each other.

I depend on you the same way in which,
you depend on me even if we don't see that way.

Instead of trying to hurt each other

Why not unite and become an invincible force.

We are stronger as a people through unity.

"All men were created equal under the eye of the law" must I say more?
